

The Accessible Information Standard - what it is and what you need to do

If you are publicly funded and an NHS or adult health or social care organisation you are legally required to follow the Accessible Information Standard, which has been in force in the UK since the 1st August 2016.

The Accessible Information Standard aims to ensure equal information rights for people who have a disability, impairment or sensory loss. People need to be able to access and understand the information they are given and to also receive any communication support that they need.

To meet the Standard, you need to ensure that for you:

- ✓ identify any communication support needs - ask people if they have any needs and how you can help meet their needs
- ✓ keep a clear record of any communication needs that you identify
- ✓ flag up any communications needs on your patient files
- ✓ share the information you have gathered within your organisation, and with other organisations that need to meet the Standard
- ✓ meet the communication needs stated. For example, provide print information in alternative accessible formats – such as Braille, Large Print, Audio, Easy Read or via email. British Sign Language (BSL) interpreters, deafblind manual interpreters or other communication professional may also be required.

These services need to be offered to all patients, but also to other service users, carers and parents with a disability, impairment or sensory loss.

The Standard covers:

- Electronic contact between the person and organisation e.g. emails and text messages
- Written correspondence e.g. letters or leaflets provided
- Communication in person at appointments
- Both 'personal' communications e.g. appointment letters, and 'generic' information e.g. leaflets
- Other ongoing support

The Standard has received broadly positive support for its aims. However, initial evidence suggests that many people are still not being offered their preferred communicative format.

Make sure you are meeting your legal obligations and that patients, service users, carers and parents can access your information.
